

A Few Words for the HKIS's 30th Anniversary

Sr CHAN Chi Duen, Ronald, FHKIS
Founding Member

I am very pleased to have read Sr FY Kan's article in the July issue of Surveyors Times. In fact, Sr Kan, our Founding President, is a talented person who has outstanding achievements in many fields besides surveying, like legal studies, music, calligraphy, etc.

Hong Kong's economic situation and property values were at a low ebb due to questions over its future, which was being negotiated between China and the United Kingdom, in 1984. The Sino-British Joint Declaration was signed on 26 September of that year. Annex III of the Declaration included all the provisions on future land matters. That year also saw the founding of our Institute and the opening of the then-City Polytechnic, Eastern Corridor Expressway, and the Prince of Wales Hospital.

A year later, the Declaration was ratified and the Sino-British Lands Commission was established to discuss issues arising from the implementation of the agreement on land leases set out in Annex III of the Declaration. The government decided that year to shelve the proposal to build the new airport at Chek Lap Kok.

It was difficult for the newly-founded Institute to recruit members. There was no immediate benefit or incentive for most professional surveyors who already had RICS or overseas qualifications to join it. There were perhaps fewer than a dozen land surveyors among the Institute's initial members because most land surveyors were members of the Hong Kong Institute of Land Surveyors (HKILS), which was established in 1976. The HKILS finally merged with the HKIS in 1991.

The newly-established HKIS, for administrative convenience, shared with the RICS Hong Kong Branch a joint office at Swire House. Swire House was a beautiful 23-storey building in Central that was completed in 1962. It covered the site of three old buildings built from 1905 to 1958: Mansions Building (Hotel Mansions, later renamed the Union Building), King's Building, and York Building. Swire House was demolished in 1998 and replaced by the present Chater House, which was completed in 2002. The two institutes jointly performed many common activities such as CPD and shared most of their staff.

When I became Honorary Secretary of the HKIS in 1990 (serving until 1991), the HKIS was then six years old and its workload and daily activities could hardly compare to what they are now. ■

Sr Wong Bay
Past President (2010-2011)

It is true that sometimes it takes a tragedy to arouse the public's awareness of an issue. The collapse of the subdivided flats at Ma Tau Wai remains a depressing recollection today, yet it was a turning point for building safety and concern for the built environment in Hong Kong – a wakeup call and lesson learned the hard way.

The 45J Ma Tau Wai Road building collapse took place in January 2010. Taking up the President's Jewel for the 2010-2011 term meant shouldering the responsibility of rebuilding public confidence and the professional image of building surveyors after the fire in the backyard was extinguished.

The Amiable Profession

The unfortunate event pushed us to work harder to enter buildings and apartments to gain better exposure to and help raise an awareness of the importance of building maintenance. Building surveys involve close examinations of buildings and face-to-face dialogue with their owners/occupants. In Cantonese we have a term for this: “入屋” (視察及家訪). In English, it literally means “entering the house” (home visits). Apart from surveying skills, we need communication skills and plenty of human touch. To me, the required attributes of a good building surveyor are diagnostic skills, updated equipment, and an ability to speak and communicate in the languages of all trades. That is why surveying is “the amiable profession”.

I'm proud of the work the HKIS BSD has done over the years to position itself as a collection of doctors and experts in building maintenance and repair. Surveyors who work in the maintenance sector need more respect, especially given the massive building stock present in a highly compact environment such as Hong Kong. Respect is not conferred by simply holding out your hands. It must be earned through one's consistent high quality work.

Professional surveyors gained their social status over time by contributing their knowledge to society. With continued positive exposure and sensitivity to public and social affairs, I believe we are heading in the right direction. Teamwork is essential. In the maintenance sector we have a saying, “三分功夫七分人事,” which means if you have done the work correctly, you will score 30% of the mark, but must complete the other 70%, which is based on human touch, to obtain full satisfaction from providing the service. I take this opportunity to again thank my team of Council members for putting together the “Flat Inspection Guide” and implementing controls over the sale of new flats.

For Younger Surveyors

“Never stop learning (Continuous Professional Development), and always contribute what you have learnt to the Profession and Society.” This is the only message I can recall from the official admission letter newly-minted professional surveyors got from the Institute congratulating them on their success. After retiring from the Housing Department, I now have more control of my own time. Building on the momentum of the HKIS Presidency, I now work at the University of Hong Kong, which gives me the perfect setting to share my vision for the profession. We must practise lifelong learning and make lifelong contributions to society!

There are voices out there saying we are settled in our comfort zone while the world is everchanging. Our zone is not getting any more comfortable. With the building industry diversifying into many branches such as green building initiatives, BEAM Plus, reviews of current laws, building information modeling, heritage projects, building awards, scholarships, etc., the HKIS needs new blood to support its presence in all these sectors while also balancing the work it is already engaged in to address social issues. More importantly, it needs fresh pairs of eyes to interpret things from new angles, and I appeal to you all to help us stay united and to continue advancing the profession.

Excellence sprouts from every discipline. I congratulate you for already being a part of our brand of excellence and hope that you will carry the good name of the HKIS with you wherever you go. ■

never stop learning, and always contribute.
